Rylie Miniex - Writing HTML Assingment

In 150-250 words:

A. Write about how you incorporated the focus that you established during the site builder project into the process of writing HTML. Remember, start from your focus! Always ask yourself it what you are writing is supporting/bringing more clarity to your focus.

B. Write about the edits that you made to your biography and how they relate to your focus.

C. Reflect on your process. What was challenging? What made sense? How was writing html a different experience from working the site builder?

A) I didn't have much tangible material to include when going into the site-building process. That being said, I focused more on the aesthetic and ambiance of my website rather than actual information about myself. Throughout this class, we began documenting various information such as biography and portfolio that I was able to use when writing my code. I used the same photos in my Visual Studio Code that I used in my site builder; it was just a matter of placement.

B) My biography was from my own point of view rather than in the third person. I did this because I wanted my biography to be more personal and intimate. I wanted the reader to feel like my bio was conversational instead of formal. My focus still targets family and friends so I included a short TikTok video that includes my voice and tried my best to keep the tone pretty chill.

C) I thought that this process would be a lot harder than it actually was. I had the bones of the website done because of the work that we did in class. I was able to follow my pseudocode and complete the assignment with ease. (I also had Aja to help me whenever I got stuck!) Writing HTML was a lot more tedious than the site builder. I had to be meticulous in closing tags and essentially making sure that there were no mistakes. (I probably still made some though). When I did make a mistake in the process, it was challenging to identify the mistake because of how visually saturated the document appeared.
